The Naked Scientists

The title is 50% correct - they are scientists - but the lab coats stay firmly buttoned up on this site. Originally starting life as a weekly radio show in Cambridge, The Naked Scientists branched out onto the Web in mid-2001. Along with audio archives of the show, the site also includes articles on everything from where ricin comes from to how to win the Lottery. In the forum, users can submit questions to the team or share their views on any science, medicine or technology-related topics. We really enjoyed learning about some of the more unusual research topics, such as dolphin language and left handedness.

Football League

The Premiership action may have finished, but the footie is far from over yet. This week sees the semi-finals of the cruel, yet highly lucrative Football League play-offs, leading up to the finals from the three Divisions over the May Bank Holiday weekend. The excitement is undeniable, but it certainly tugs at the heart strings around Picks Towers to see the defeated teams missing out on promotion. Ever the supporters of a "plucky trier", this year we are rooting for persistent play-off contenders, Wolves. You can find the latest news and results from all the matches on this official League site, as well as the rules of the game, competitions, and loads more.

Slipups.com

You'd think with the amount of money poured into movies and TV shows that they could at least pay a little more attention to continuity, wouldn't you? Alas, even that masterpiece of cinema, The Fellowship of the Ring, is not without its bloopers and oversights. (Is that really a modern day car there in Middle Earth?) This site collects user-submitted examples of thoughtlessness and general buffoonery in films, TV, books and speeches. There's obviously plenty for George W. Bush, but sadly nothing yet for Donald Rumsfeld. Good to see there's a strong British presence with 11 gaffes from the royally un-PC
